Reason for this message

A claim has been filed with the Civil Resolution Tribunal (CRT) in which you are named as a respondent. The CRT is an independent administrative tribunal, authorized by legislation to resolve claims under the Intimate Images Protection Act. This means the CRT can make decisions and orders about sharing or threatening to share an intimate image of someone without their consent. CRT orders are enforceable in court, just like court orders.

The Dispute Notice describing the claim is attached. This is a legal claim against you.

What you must do

You have 14 days to submit a response to the Dispute Notice.

You don't need to include all the information you have about the claim with your response. You only need to provide your initial position on the applicant's claims and the remedies they requested. You can provide more information later in the dispute resolution process.

How to respond to the Dispute Notice:

It is free to submit your response online. To respond online, you must have a private email address. This is needed to create a CRT Account to manage your claim. We'll also send CRT documents and communications to your email address. If you don't have a private email address, contact us for other options.

To submit your response online:

Deadline

You have 14 days to submit a response to the Dispute Notice. You may ask for more time by completing the online form or by emailing your request to images@crtbc.ca. You'll need to explain why you are unable to respond by the deadline.

What happens if not done

If you don't submit your response within 14 days, the claim won't go away. The CRT may make a default order against you which can be enforced like a court order. In a default order, the CRT assumes you're at fault. You won't get a chance to explain your side of the claim.

Please contact the CRT at images@crtbc.ca if you have any questions. Be sure to include your dispute number in the subject line.
